The 2013 Cabernet Sauvignon also has 10% Merlot added in. It was aged for 11 months in a mixture of used (10% French and 60% American) and new American (30%) oak. I liked its sibling reviewed this issue and this has many of the same good ideas, including structure, flavor and precision. It is a bit more open and easy, though, with a lusher feel, although it hardly stints on structure. Like its sibling, the mid-palate concentration has some limits. Its blended sibling has a bit more character and intensity, but this is somewhat more expressive early on. They are mostly peas in a pod, and they are both worth a look. Sourced from 14-year-old vines, there were 200 cases produced.

This winery is one of the New Jersey entrants (from Hammonton, N.J.) that snuck in. These are actually pretty good and well worth a try. They tend to be a bit lean and intellectual, with attention to structure rather than fleshy, sweet fruit. It makes them pretty nice food wines, although probably not so charming as standalone sippers. Overall, they show some good ideas.
